Why is there an altar cross at St. Edward?

Good question, as it's one that I've heard already in my short time here at St. Edward. Put simply, the GIRM, that is the General Instruction of the Roman Missal (think "Instruction Manual for Catholic Mass"), says that "either on the altar or near it, there is to be a cross, with the figure of Christ crucified upon it, a cross clearly visible to the assembled people." What does this mean? Don't we already have a crucifix hanging above the altar that is visible to all? Isn't this an impediment to sight? The altar cross was specifically "brought back" during the papacy of Pope Benedict XVI. Pope Benedict always celebrated Mass with a crucifix on the altar. He did this to emphasize that the center of the Mass and our faith is the crucifix itself – the fact that Christ sacrificed himself for us. When we look at the altar, we see the fact of this sacrifice, not only in the Eucharist, but also in the cross. The cross brings our attention to the altar and what is about to occur, that is the confection (aka transubstantiation) of the bread and wine into the Holy Eucharist. It becomes a common point of reference. As Pope Benedict says, it is an "image that concentrates and unifies our sight." However, why does the cross face the celebrant and not the people? The answer is twofold. First, at a cursory glance, this allows the priest to reflect upon the cross during Mass. While this is important, we can expand on this. The crucifixion of our Lord and the institution of the Holy Eucharist are one in the same sacrifice. This relationship is visualized in the altar cross. Christ himself is facing the altar where the sacrifice of the Eucharist is offered, which is also offered for our salvation. So, the cross is not facing the celebrant, but facing the altar. In short, the altar cross allows for both priest and congregation to turn towards the Lord. Let us look with love upon Christ, whose death is made present through the words of the priest.

Praying for you,

Joseph Reina, Director of Liturgy
