"I will raise him on the last days"

-John 6:40

Greetings (Boozhoo Aaniin)!

In Luke's gospel the beatitudes are given by Jesus on a plain, in Matthew, on a mount. This brings the Matthean Jesus into closer proximity to Moses, who gave God's law to his people on Mount Sinai. Here Jesus is the proponent of a new program of life. The difference between Sinai and the mount of the beatitudes is notable. In the Decalogue God makes demands of his people; in the beatitudes he acts on behalf of his people.

The beatitudes are eight in Matthew, four in Luke. The first category addressed are the "poor in spirit"; they are particularly favored by God. Today's reading from Zephaniah also speaks of the privileged place of the poor and humble. Two of the terms that appear in this short passage from the prophet are particularly rich in meaning in Hebrew thought: "the remnant" and "the poor." Both terms are reflective of God's goodness and concern.

In the face of Israel's sinful conduct and proven unworthiness, the prophet speaks at length about approaching doom and destruction. Yet the question remains: what is to happen to Yahweh's plan for his people, the promise of favor and fidelity? The answer is "the remnant," that segment of the population that would remain faithful and serve as carriers of the promise.

The chief characteristic of the remnant is a poor and humble heart. These are the "poor of God," or the anawim. They began as a social category, the people in Israel who were deprived and destitute, especially widows and orphans. The poor were totally dependent on God and were to be the special concern of the Hebrew people. Eventually, the concept of the "poor" moved from a material dependence to a more spiritual one, a dependence characteristic of any true believer. This paves the way for the gospel's "poor in spirit."

This is the first category mentioned in the beatitudes. Poverty of spirit has a priority of place but is, in a sense, a summary of all the beatitudes. Complete dependence on God is characteristic of the sorrowing, the merciful, the pure of heart, the persecuted, and the peacemakers. In the face of human calamity, these are the people who look to God for answers. In him they place their trust and confidence. They are truly "the poor in spirit."

The call to poverty of spirit touches all of us. It is a guiding light that, from our privileged place, enables us to see those who suffer in this world from a new perspective. Regardless of what worldly standards may say, these are the people beloved by God and whom we too must love. It is difficult to look at vast human tragedy and believe in a God who cares. We must constantly return to the belief that the last word has not been spoken.

We too are to be the "poor in spirit."

God bless, Father Trevor Peterson
