As I write on Monday, March 13, our bulletin publisher has asked that we submit this weekend's copy early, due to the impending storm. So in order to expedite matters, here is an excerpt from a wonderful book, Meditations Before Mass, written by a famous twentieth-century theologian and spiritual writer, Msgr. Romano Guardini.

Faithfully your priest,
Fr. George Hafemann

+ + +

The word is a thing of mystery, so volatile that it vanishes almost on the lip, yet so powerful that it decides fates and determines the meaning of existence. A frail structure shaped by fleeting sound, it yet contains the eternal: truth. Words come from within, rising as sounds fashioned by the organs of a man's body, as expressions of his heart and spirit. He utters them, yet he does not create them, for they already existed independently of him. One word is related to another; together they form the great unity of language, that empire of truth-forms in which a man lives.

The living word arranges itself onion-like in various layers. The outermost is that of simple communication: news or a command. These can be conveyed artificially, as they often are, by the printed word or some sound-apparatus which reproduces human speech. The syllables thus produced draw their significance from genuine language, and they answer specific needs well enough. But this superficial, often mechanical, level of words is not yet true speech, which exists only in proportion to the amount of inner conviction carried over from the speaker to that which is spoken. The more clearly his meaning is embodied in intelligible sounds, and the more fully his heart is able to express itself, the more truly does his speech become living word.

The inmost spirit lives by truth, by its recognition of what is and what is and what has value. Man expresses this truth in words. The more fully he recognizes it, the better his speech and the richer his words. Both truth can be recognized only from silence. The constant talker will never, or a least rarely, grasp truth. Of course even he must experience some truths, otherwise he could not exist. He does notice certain facts, observe certain relations, draw conclusions and make plans. But he does not yet possess genuine truth, which comes into being only when the essence of an object, the significance of a relation, and what is valid and eternal in this world reveal themselves. This requires the spaciousness, freedom, and pure receptiveness of that inner "clean-swept room" which silence alone can create. The constant talker knows no such room within himself; hence he cannot know truth. Truth, and consequently the reality of speech, depends upon the speaker's ability to speak and to be silent in turn.

LIVING MUSEUM

There is always something fun going on in Ms. Hand's fifth grade classroom. The 5th graders were assigned to research and take on the wonderful traits of a famous inventor who created an invention that met the social needs of others. Each student had the opportunity to present their project at a "Living Museum" to the entire St. John student body. The inventors presented a speech in the first person, facts, poster and even some props! They did a wonderful job and had a great time doing it!
